New community fridge based on mutual aid and love

To help combat hunger in the community, Parkway neighbors came together to open a community fridge in Roslindale. Located at the Roslindale Market at 4140 Washington St., the Roslindale Community Fridge is a “community-run fridge based on mutual aid and love”.

According to Feeding America, one in eight people in the Boston area are expected to experience food insecurity in 2020 as a result of the impact of COVID-19, a 59 percent increase over the most recent report which showed one in 13 people were food insecure in the region before the pandemic. Community fridges, which have been popping up in Boston over the past month, are helping alleviate some of this burden.

A “Community Fridge” is a refrigerator located in a public space, usually covered in art by local artists. The fridges are a type of mutual aid project which enables food to be shared within a community. Over the past few months, community fridges have been launched in many neighborhoods across Boston, including JP, Allston, Dorchester, and Roslindale. The Boston Community Fridge in JP (@bostoncommunityfridge), the Dorchester Community Fridge (@dotcommunityfridge) and the In Our Hearts NYC Collective (@iohny) were the blueprint/inspiration for the Roslindale Community Fridge.

Parking concerns opponents of Rock Hill housing

Richard Heath
Staff Reporter

It’s common knowledge in Boston that parking is the stalking horse to stop or shrink housing development, but Jamaica Plain seems to have it down to a science.

On one side of town, the landlord of a beer garden has sued to stop construction of 202 units of supportive and low-income housing alleging it interferes with the parking needs of his tenant.

On the other side, a modest, 12-unit, four -story apartment house is opposed because apparently there’s too much parking.

Matthew Hayes owns a large parcel of concrete garages built in 1920, one of which is his auto body shop, on Rock Hill Road, a private way Hayes maintains off Paul Gore Street.

He has for the last four years been attempting to build market rate rental housing in a corner of that land replacing two garage rows.

Hayes is practically on a first name basis with the Jamaica Plain zoning committee; he, his attorney Derric Small and architect Ed Forte met with them on March 20 and Dec.18, 2019 and again on Oct. 7, 2020.

He returned a third time after being flatly rejected by the Boston Zoning Board of Appeals (ZBA) on Jan. 18,2020 largely because it was too big.

Board chair Christine Araujo put it bluntly: go small.

“That’s the vote. Come back with another proposal- a new proposal –in a year,” she said.

Readville Neighborhood Watch wins HP Group of the Year

Readville Neighborhood Watch chair Roberta Johnnene carefully placed lanterns and flashlights on top of the park tables at Iacono Playground on the evening of Thursday Oct. 15 at the group’s meeting and pandemic-era National Night Out. Little did she know that the spotlight would be shining on her, as she received the Crimefighter of the Year award from the Boston Police Department (BPD).

“As you know, yearly we usually have a National Night Out event, and last year it was right here in this park with a lot of people, music, food and games for the kids,” BPD Area E-18 Sgt. Daniel Keane said. “Obviously with COVID-19, we’re unable to do that anymore. However, the City still wants to recognize a community group and a community leader, and this year we have chosen Roberta as well as the group itself.

BPDA moves forward Western Ave. rezoning study

Jeff Sullivan
Staff Reporter

The Boston Planning and Development Agency (BPDA) met with residents virtually on Wednesday, Oct. 14, and discussed the proposed rezoning of Western Avenue between the Leo Birmingham Parkway and Barry's Corner in Lower Allston.

BPDA Project Manager Gerald Autler said the proposal is designed to rezone the area for easier process for developers and to recommend public realm improvements and transportation enhancements. He said so far the idea has been to gather data on what the neighborhood would like to see and nothing has been set in stone. He added the transportation aspect of the study will also be informed by the Allston Brighton Mobility Study.

"The existing zoning, which is 30 years old, is out of date and doesn't provide the predictability in what the neighborhood wants in terms of what can and can't be developed," he said. "It doesn't facilitate the kind of development that is economically feasible and can deliver benefits in the form of new housing, new activity, new retail space, affordable housing and better public realm in the neighborhood."

Autler said the effort does not include the small scale housing within most of Lower Allston, but focuses on vacant lots, underdeveloped parcels and old industrial parcels. He said the improvements will not change the neighborhood overnight, and that it will take some time, maybe decades, before the zoning changes make a lasting impact on the neighborhood.

He said they are currently collecting feedback from the neighborhood on what they'd like to see in terms of future projects, and one big thing they've seen so far has been the desire for more open space in Lower Allston, and more pedestrian connections between parcels.

Autler also said there is a strong desire for multi-modal travel improvements in the forms of improved pedestrian access and bike infrastructure. He said pushing back building lines for increased pedestrian access will be a long-term goal, since it would have to happen after buildings are knocked down and redeveloped, but in the shorter term, he said bike and bus lanes are options in some areas.

In terms of actual zoning plans, Autler said the idea is to allow increased density to help reduce developer costs while requiring those developers to provide more public benefits in some form to offset the density.

"In order to capture a fair share of the value that's created for the public," he said.

Resident Barbara Parmenter said one of the more frustrating aspects of the development process has been the project-by-project approach to zoning and zoning variances that has been occurring across the city, and she is hopeful the corridor-wide zoning change could have a lasting impact. She said she would like to see specific requirements across the corridor for parking management, the creation of a common mobility fund for developers to pay into, green infrastructure requirements to reduce stormwater and urban heat islands and afford-

The idea for a Roslindale Community Fridge began last month with Roslindale community members Arielle Goldhaber, Laurie Cowie-Haskell and Jenny Nguyen, who wanted to make this fridge a reality. They emailed Boston Community Fridge, and became connected from there.

“It [the project] grew exponentially, really thanks to the giant web of contacts via Instagram. Instagram has become a huge platform for sharing information about local protests, resources, and getting families what they need,” explained Goldhaber. “But when it comes to ‘who was part of the planning,’ it branched off into the community and our neighbors. We didn’t know how to build a shed, we didn’t know how to paint a fridge, we didn’t know what would come next. It was a stream of steady thoughts and recommendations from our peers that helped us plan everything, literally minute by minute. Personalities and leaderships were filled as we saw the need.”

Goldhaber helped create artwork for media and flyer, while other local community members created logos, volunteered as carpenters, and helped maintain social media pages.

The steps for starting this project seemed simple, but organizers said it wasn’t easy. The volunteers explained that finding a fridge, host, carpenter and large group of volunteers was like starting a business without any funding or fancy marketing. They had to achieve their goals by relying on the community, volunteers, and community support.

The owner of Roslindale Market (the host of the Roslindale Community Fridge) is a long time friend of volunteer Jenny Nguyen.

“While she calls it complete luck that the Roslindale Market had space for our fridge, we know it was his love for her, his customers, and the community that led him to make space for us. It takes a (socially-distanced and Covid-knowledgeable) village!” stated Goldhaber.

“It was also really important to us, as the following and the group of volunteers grew, to maintain complete transparency and to encourage a diversity of voices. We wanted to make the fridge available to everyone, and that meant listening to what everyone needed. We have a massive group chat, and have since broken down into teams to better concentrate our interests and energies,” explained the Roslindale Community Fridge volunteers. “People were excited to get involved right away, but remember that this effort is entirely volunteer-based and community-organized. We all have full, busy lives outside of the Community Fridge. Like the motto used for these fridges across the country: ‘Take what you need, leave/give what you can’ - that applies to more than food and donations. It is truly a miracle that the fridge was open and running within a month. But we know for a fact this miracle was made by the odd hours worked outside of a job, a second job, school work, family time, and previous commitments.”

The community response to the fridge has been overwhelmingly positive. “One of the most surprising responses we have received from people passing by is ‘When is it open?’ They are so pleasantly surprised when we tell them it is on and open 24/7,” remarked Goldhaber. “And furthermore, they are ecstatic when we tell them the Fridge is completely community-run and funded. Is it really that revolutionary to have a constant source of nourishment? To have a choice? To not have to rely on a local or federally funded program, which people seem to have so much disdain for? That personally makes me so hurt, and angry. Not because there aren’t programs that aim to fill that gap, but because of what led to that feeling of apathy and mistrust, regardless of intention. It’s our turn to create something that actually works for the people.”

Goldhaber wants community members to know that this is an ongoing project. “We continue to work hard to let everyone know about the fridge! It’s an ongoing project. We want the entire neighborhood to know, and to feel comfortable visiting it when they want or need. This has definitely been the most difficult aspect – eliciting a full community response. Right now, it seems like only a fraction of Roslindale is aware of its existence!” She stated.

The Roslindale Community Fridge is currently seeking volunteers. Volunteer positions include fridge monitoring/cleaning, fridge delivery assistance (pick-up and delivery), help with large food donations, helping with social media, passing flyers around the neighborhood, and legal research/translating. There is no need to sign up for smaller food donations. The fridge accepts fresh food/produce, pantry goods, dairy, prepared/packaged meals, baked goods with listed ingredients, cleaning supplies, menstrual products, and paper bags. It does NOT accept raw meat and seafood, alcoholic beverages, unlabeled or unopened meals, and leftovers.

“Our neighbors, if we think of them and come to accept them as our family and friends, we know and we feel in our hearts that they deserve to feel safe and secure. This is for all of us, no stigma attached. It’s for everyone, always. For the community, by the community,” stated Goldhaber.

borhood Watch group, Roberta presides over the meetings in an orderly and efficient manner. She listens intently to all concerns, and if she cannot answer a question, she researches it diligently to find the answer.”

Johnnene stressed that it was the group, not herself, that is deserving of recognition because of their continued participation at meetings and involvement with local issues, including the preservation of open space and reasonable limitations on development.

“For me, the award is really about the community,” she said, “and the people who care enough about it to come to the meetings and voice their concerns and listen to what other people have to say. They don’t just come out on a big issue like a 500-unit development, but also for issues like the firecrackers and businesses popping up in residential neighborhoods. This community cares about our neighborhood.”

Preserving the area’s natural resources, including Mother Brook and the parks, is critical, particularly during COVID-19. Being able to be outdoors has been key to helping people cope mentally during the pandemic.

Another aspect about the group is its ability to form partnerships with local officials and the police, Johnnene added. She particularly singled out Gerri McElmoyle, the E-18 community liaison.

“She listens to the community, she really cares and she makes an effort to get to know everyone and follow up on issues,” Johnnene said. “When people care about where they live, their quality of life and respect their leaders, they get that respect back.”

McElmoyle said this is the first time in her 17 years with the department that she can remember Hyde Park winning Crimefighter of the Year.

“A successful watch group is never about who moderates the meeting,” she continued. “But it’s about the people who communicate with their public officials and the police who make it a safe and great place to live.”

One of those public officials who attended the meeting is Rob Consalvo, who won the state primary for the district’s State Representative seat. He is the presumptive successor to outgoing State Rep. Angelo Scaccia once the final election is held on Nov. 3.

A lifelong Hyde Park resident, Consalvo stressed his community commitment and his ability to spring into action because of his “trifecta of experience” in all three branches of government. He started his career working for the late U.S. Sen. Edward “Ted” Kennedy then served under Scaccia at the State House before being elected as the District 5 City Councilor for almost 13 years.

“I ran for State Representative because I thought it provided me a unique opportunity to give back to the community,” Consalvo said.

He pledged to increase the district’s voice in government by creating a neighborhood office, as he did as a City Councilor. Newsletters and town halls will be other means of engagement.

One of Consalvo’s primary goals is conservation. Many of the parks fall under the purview of the Department of Conservation and Recreation (DCR), a state-funded system that has been historically lacking funds.

“I want to be a champion for DCR,” he said, “to make sure they’re properly funded, to make sure they’re properly staffed, and to make sure they’re paying attention to our community.”

He pointed out that the 14th Suffolk District has more DCR land than any other, including “Boston’s second Hatch Shell,” the Martini Shell. Consalvo said he would work for the creation of an open space masterplan for Hyde Park.

Another priority is dealing with the COVID-19 pandemic. This past week, Hyde Park’s COVID-19 rate was 9.1, according to the Boston Public Health Commission’s website. There is no Hyde Park testing site.

“COVID is a serious issue and it’s hit personal for me,” Consalvo said, noting that his parents had COVID and now are well.

PR needs better pr, or does it?

Parker River National Wildlife Refuge needs better public relations to draw attention to what a treasure this piece of real estate is. Or perhaps this wildlife refuge does NOT want to become popular with humans.

It was West Roxbury's now-retired Carl Johnson, the legendary marine biology teacher at South Boston High School, who many years ago first mentioned the Newbury, Massachusetts, site.

Carl spent virtually his entire teacher career at South Boston High (now optimistically called Excel High School) serving under various head(master)s during and after desegregation. It was there at East Sixth and G Street that he wrote grants to take urban students on overnight sailing sloops as well as on countless day trips to the Parker River National Wildlife Refuge to study intertidal life.

To students of all races attending the school on Telegraph Hill whose idea of a beach was Carson Beach, the seven-and-a-half mile desolate barrier beach, much of which is accessible only on dirt roads, must have been a visual shock. A beach without people in all its beautiful desolation, confronting (at times) the raging North Atlantic, behind rolling untouched, litter-free dunes, is, to use an overworked word these days, an awesome sight.

Under the aegis of The Department of the Interior, the 4700-acre National Wildlife Refuge has set its first loyalty to animal life, not to people, as do the National Park Service and National Seashore folks. Even its creation date is remarkable: 1941, when the United States was becoming embroiled in a world war.

More than 3000 of its acreage is salt marsh, with the rest comprising maritime forest, shrub land, cranberry bog, and freshwater marsh as well as dunes and beach. It provides pristine coastal habitat for over 300 species of resident and migratory birds, as well as a large variety of mammals, insects, fish, reptiles and amphibians. The refuge also provides critical habitat for the federally threatened piping plover—a bane to beachgoers frequenting many other area beaches because it has to be protected.

Truth be told, I had never been to Parker River National Wildlife Refuge until recently, although friends prize the area for its birding opportunities. The parking, limited to seven lots with each accommodating maybe two dozen cars, must fill up quickly on a hot summer day, in spite of the fact there are no lifeguards, trash cans, and showers/changing rooms. There is lots of signage pointing out the possibility of rip currents resulting from the angry wave action.

My Kind of Town/ Joe Galeota

Carl's students never went swimming there: they were there to study and see nature at its best. Regardless of one's political beliefs, the phrase “Drain the swamp”—while it has appeal to voters tired of traditional Washington politics—is heretical to science teachers because of all the tiny forms of life present in the Parker River tidal flats and marshes.

Thank you, Rachel Carson, for making us all aware of importance of marshes with your 1947 publication, which pays homage to Parker River as a vital cog in the Atlantic Flyway. And thanks to Carl (as well as to the Englers and Youngers) for recommending it as a people-free destination on a brisk, beautiful fall day.

Hayes did just that on Oct. 7. He came back with a smaller building of 12 units, down from the original 15, and another change of 32 on-site parking spaces.

Twenty spaces will be under the apartment building at 29 Rock Hill Rd. and an additional 12 spaces in a garage Hayes owns at 12 Rock Hill currently leased to O'Malley Roofing.

The building sits on the floor of the old Soule Quarry and Forte explained the design.

"It's a remarkable site facing a 40-foot rock cliff at the rear of the building," he added.

"All parking will be covered under the new building or in an existing garage on site." Hayes said he has reduced the number of units from 15 to 12 but is still committed to offering them at 15 percent to 20 percent below market rate.

"Those rents will be in the mid 2,000's for a two bedroom apartment," he said.

"For four years parking has been the topic of discussion. The neighborhood drove this," Hayes said. "From the beginning the biggest thing they pushed for was parking. Since I own the property I will easily add parking to the existing garage I own."

Kendra Halliwell is an architect and a zoning committee member.

"I voted against this the first time because the garage doors face the street. This is an unfriendly look on the street of garage doors," she said overlooking the fact that three car doors face the auto body shop and a parallel row of garages owned by Mordecai Levin.

Halliwell voted against it again Oct. 7.

Committee member Andrea Howley was enthusiastic.

"You've kept the rents down to affordable," she said. "You deserve to be applauded. It's pretty commendable that you took all the parking off the street. Good job."

Pat Feely of Paul Gore Street was not applauding.

"This building is being smashed into a six-unit site," she said. "Cars are going to be coming in and out of that street. You're ignoring 100 people who are opposed."

Feely was unimpressed with the rent reduction too.

"People on Paul Gore Street are paying much less," she said. "About $1,800 a month on average."

Carmel Levy said that there was too much parking.

"We have to stop building parking," he said. "There is the orange line, the green line and three bus lines all near that street."

Feely would have none of that.

"There's elderly on the street," she said. "They need to have a car come to their house. They can't walk to the orange line or the buses."

Kevin Rainsford lives on Paul Gore Street, is chair of the neighborhood council and as such is an ex officio member of the zoning committee.

He recused himself from taking a vote but not from making a statement.

"I come bearing bad news," he said. "You haven't really met with the community. You've met with the abutters and you've met the concerns of the abutters but not of the community."

"I always say that the neighborhood council needs to hear voices of the community."

"Community" to Rainsford apparently means the length of Paul Gore Street.

Omer Hecht lives on Marmion Street.

"No matter what he [Hayes] does, he gets no support," Hecht said. "The community has dragged down this project. A huge amount of time has been spent about parking. Just like every other project."

"Thirty six parking spaces are 36 little houses for cars. NIMBY people want to build 36 little houses for cars. It's ridiculous."

Gerry O'Connor is a committee member who he lives in Forest Hills.

"This is a familiar situation," he said. "Give as much parking to satisfy the abutters. It's not the applicant's fault. We have two choices: No parking or too much parking."

O'Connor was in support.

The committee voted 9 to 5 with one abstention to approve the development.

William J. Gormley Funeral Service

Since the Federal, State, Local authorities have put in place social distancing guidelines, and places of worship have suspended services, we've found ways to help families continue to honor their loved ones.

We can meet with you in person, via telephone or email to assist with the planning process. We can also offer some alternatives to traditional rites and ceremonies by live streaming, online condolence books as well as other alternatives to traditional choices.

able housing requirements. One big concern residents raised was that of rental versus homeownership. Allston in particular has been historically prone to rental development, with less than 20 percent of its current housing stock being homeownership. Autler said there are not currently mechanisms to require homeownership through zoning, but said the BPDA is working to make developers aware of the neighborhood's desire for more condominiums, single-family homes and townhouses. "There's significant interest in the residents to see a better balance of rental and homeownership and that's something we currently stress to every development team that walks through our door and certainly the developers of housing here are aware of that as well," he said. "It's something we'll have to continue to put pressure on people to continue." Former District 9 City Councilor Mark Ciommo asked about relocating the Public Works yard at the corner of Everett Street and Western Avenue and the EMS service yard adjacent to it. "We have heard loud and clear and completely agree with people that that is not a very desirable use of that property which could serve any number of imaginable uses of greater perceived value to people in the neighborhood," Autler said. "The problem is it's much easier said than done. That yard does serve a critical function to the neighborhood, mainly clearing the streets of snow and salting them keeping everyone safe... There just aren't that many places to put it."

Ciommo said he felt it was the time to do it, and that it's been an issue for a long time, and felt that the large projects put forth by major property owners like Harvard could be leveraged to move the yard to a more equitable location. "I know there were discussions years ago about relocating to a particular public works yard," he said. "Anything we're doing around a Western Avenue study has to really focus in on where these facilities can go. This is an opportunity for Harvard and all the other big players to find a location and build it out for us, quite frankly, and maybe both of them in close proximity... I would just urge more focus on this because it would open up an opportunity for possibly one of those developers to take that as a more desirable location. The more we approve projects, then there will be even less space to put these very important services to the neighborhood."
